For this reason, many other editors offer additional tools and advanced features that are similar to Photoshop and have a similarly powerful editing system. I've identified some key differences below, which you may see in your new editing program. To translate between the features that may be familiar to you and the ones that may be different, here are some common terms: * An "object" is a circular or rectangular selection of pixels on the canvas, that is, on a document. * A "layer" is an object that you can separate from the file and edit individually. You generally open new layers, but you can also copy and paste layers. * A "channel" is a color palette with similar colors and hue options. You can create a new channel, create and edit selections in the channel, add blending options, and group channels to work together. * A "layer mask" is a simple selection that you use to hide or show color or texture. * A "layer styles" is a style based on masking or a group of layers that you can use to apply a gradient, color, pattern, or text across an entire document. * An "image adjustment" is a change to the entire canvas. * An "object layer" is a layer that you can duplicate and then work in a few different ways. * An "icon" is a square thumbnail that displays the settings for a tool, like the eraser icon. * A "brush" is a circular or rectangular selection tool that contains various settings, such as size and hardness. * A "path" is a shape, similar to an icon, that you can trace over an object to create more precise edges. * A "selection" is an object that you can manipulate

The Spot Healing Brush is a tool that can correct for multiple-spot blemishes on your image. The Type Tool allows you to set the font for text.
