cracks in hmips in the united states of america are rare, though some manufacturers have reported cracking in their products after only a few years in service. the cause of these cracks remains uncertain, though it is believed that they are most often the result of improper maintenance of the pole legs. cracks may begin at the toes of the base plates to pole shaft welds. the structural inspection of hmips by an engineering firm in the mid 1970s revealed that cracks were beginning to develop at the toes of the base plates to pole shaft welds of a large proportion of the legs in a particular region of the united states. the cracks were very deep and had formed at the base of the welds. the united states federal highway administration (fhwa) commissioned a study in the late 1970s. the study was conducted by the american railway engineering and maintenance-of-way association (arema), inc., a nationally recognized independent engineering firm that has extensive experience in the performance of structural inspections of elevated highway systems. the study revealed that a large number of hmips had developed cracks at the welds in the years following their construction. the cracks were becoming more and more severe, and some of the poles had actually collapsed. the united states federal highway administration (fhwa) commissioned a study in the late 1970s. the study was conducted by the american railway engineering and maintenance-of-way association (arema), inc., a nationally recognized independent engineering firm that has extensive experience in the performance of structural inspections of elevated highway systems. the study revealed that a large number of hmips had developed cracks at the welds in the years following their construction.
